a military coup in the Cocos (Keeling) Islands has become more likely. If that happens and the government in Jakarta then sends troops to the islands to quell a revolt, there are concerns that schools in Australia and Indonesia will be hurt. Education in the North Keeling Islands is not under Indonesian control. Education is under the jurisdiction of the State of Western Australia. The unions representing teachers in the state of Western Australia have concerns about the school system in the northern part of the Cocos (Keeling) Islands. If a military coup, or even an internal rebellion, threatens education in the northern part of the Cocos Islands, teachers in the state of Western Australia will be affected. The Cocos Islands lie about one thousand kilometres to the west of Java and eight hundred kilometres north-west of Perth. It is an Australian territory in the Indian Ocean. The population of the Cocos (Keeling) Islands are residents of the Cocos (Keeling) Islands. Residents of the island live on the island and rely on the telecommunications services in the islands. Charter employees of the telecommunications and broadcasting companies on the island are employed on the island. If there is a military coup or a rebellion, the government in Jakarta will have to fly in military personnel to the island to restore order. If such incidents occur and the military take control of the islands, there is the threat of disruption in communication between the islands and Indonesia and the Pacific region. 09e8f5149f
