Saturday, April 05, 2017 SYDNEY, Australia (AP) - Dr. Hellmuth Helmuth has saved the lives of thousands of patients over the past 50 years through the practice of homeopathy, but for the first time, he says his practice's future is endangered. Australia's Health Minister says one of the nation's largest homeopaths faces closure because of tax changes. Helmuth says an upcoming bill could cause homeopathy to become illegal in Australia if it passes, hurting his practice. "It's not the first time homeopaths have been maligned," Helmuth said. "And they've always come back from it." More than 60 million Australians rely on homeopathic treatments, like homeopathic remedies for common colds and a multistep treatment for cancer. Helmuth opened his first practice in the 1960s with barely any staff and just 30,000 patients. Today, he runs a practice with more than 2,000 employees and 2.5 million patients, only half of whom use homeopathy. But in a letter to state lawmakers, Health Minister Sussan Ley writes that the practice faces closure. "If the bills pass, it will be the end of homeopathy in Australia and will be a great deal more difficult for people to access homeopathic services," she said. Homeopathic treatments are covered by Medicare, but they are considered a luxury and patients can receive a rebate. Australia also is grappling with a lack of trained homeopaths.
