Given that there's no way to simply call entity.name() directly, what is the expected behavior of the following: entity.name == entities.name entity.name() == entities.name() entity.name() != entities.name() In testing, the first two cases return true, but the third returns false. I assume there's some corner-case here that I am not seeing. Is there a broader understanding of when entity.name is expected, and when entities.name is expected? Note: This is in the play-framework, and is not specifically in the context of querying. A: When is entity.name expected, and not entity.name()? When you pass entities as a list of arguments to a method. class Entity { String name } class Main extends
