Kolaten Chipper, the high-tech bird chipper that has netted a legacy of ignominious namesakes, has one last trick up its sleeve. It will look a lot like a pile of wet leaves. In a test at its Dutch plant, the Amsterdam-based company is putting one more effort into making its "green" chipper a piece of the eco-friendly urban landscape. Advertisement The company has switched from gasoline to biogas, or natural gas, to power the chipper. It's a natural fit, as the chipper sits at the end of a process called gasification, which converts organic material — such as food scraps — into a biogas. All that remains is to pipe the gas to a boiler, where it can be made into electricity. "The more efficient you are, the more environmentally friendly you are," says Chris Ruhl, Kolaten Chipper's head of technical development.
