Elden Ring First Impressions You're playing as a Squire to one of the Seven Elden Lords. You begin with being at the lowest rank, Bracer, and your goal is to rise up to become a Gladiator. Tarnished World The story is fairly interesting for a Fantasy-type story. It's a class-based RPG where you can change class during the game, as you gain experience, to unlock new classes. Gameplay The combat is combat-based. You have to gather your team (a leader and 3 to 6 party members) and be assigned to attack by matching with your leader's attack style. The combat is dynamic in nature. The flow of battle is based on all parties participating simultaneously, so it's best to have a lot of different party members on the field. Your party can be split if you have enough party members. There are skill trees so you can have a team of 3, 4, and 6 members. There is also a skill tree for the Elden Lords. Those 2 skill trees look great. Although, I've only experienced the Elden Lords skill tree, not sure about the one for the Squires. Gameplay looks good. The class change is neat. It's easy to switch from class to class because it's just a matter of finding the right "stick" for that class. In the later part of the game, there's a section where you go to a sub-zone (depending on which class you are). You have to explore it and then go to another sub-zone that another leader tells you to explore. You can start from some location (random), and you can choose to explore a predetermined location. I've seen some other RPG games that have a predetermined map. You can choose the order you want to explore the map. That's something new! The developers said, "There are no dungeons in this game. There are however, side quests." I did not check those quests since I've been stuck in the shop-like tab. At the end of a battle, you
