The discovery that complement receptor 1, CD21, is the virus receptor on B cells for the adenovirus, adenovirus 2 (Ad 2) is the first example of a receptor for a human virus to be cloned and sequenced. Recently, we have cloned the receptor for Ad 2 on normal human peripheral blood lymphocytes and identified several related receptors for Ad 2 on mouse lymphocytes, mast cells, and macrophages. The receptor for Ad 2 on hematopoietic cells is a glycoprotein of 90-100,000 daltons and binds to the virus via its RGD sequence, which has two potential functions: to bind with the integrin of the cell and interact with vitronectin and fibrinogen in the extracellular matrix. Deletion mapping of the Ad 2 receptor indicates that the RGD sequence is located between amino acids 151-165 and the cytoplasmic tail contains two to four nucleotides that are essential for the production of virus-specific antibody. The receptor for Ad 2 on hematopoietic cells and the binding characteristics of Ad 2 to hematopoietic cells are distinct from the receptor for Ad 2 on B cells.Linear models of primary soil phosphorus accumulation by maturation durations in a subtropical ecosystem: effects of the mean and shape of the long-term phosphorus cycle. Relative contributions of the mean and shape of the long-term phosphorus (P) cycle to P accumulation in soils were explored using a linear model of primary P accumulation by maturation duration in a subtropical ecosystem. The approach, which has been used for descriptive purposes in previous studies, was not intended to make accurate predictions of P cycling or P accumulation in this system. Rather, the goal of the study was to test whether the linear model proposed by Nelson and Rubinstein (1998) could approximate the field data presented in that report, and to determine which factors, if any, had a significant effect on the strengths and precisions of
