- Main heroine is directed by Tenda (an author of our previous game "Slice of Life"). - Tenda designed a story that shares the same theme as a previous game, but with a completely different heroine. - Has its own unique and natural flow, so you can enjoy this game just as easily as playing previous games. Do you have what it takes to become a catgirl?!? Not all who dream are destined to become catgirls. But why is it that only we humans can see their cuteness? Despite her abilities, the catgirl heroine of this story never could make humans see her! This is a story of a person who is unable to live her life. A person who can't stop thinking about the cute catgirls. A story about a person who will become a catgirl in order to erase the fact that she's human... A new road to 'Endgames'! The initial cause of this epic game was to serialize its sequel "Endgames", and thus form a new story. It does not mean that this game has nothing to do with the sequel. Rather, when the story of this game begins, the story of "Endgames" will end, and when the story of "Endgames" ends, this game will begin... A world filled with catgirls. You have no choice but to believe in this world. You're a catgirl, a mysterious being from another planet. You arrived on Earth by accident and then lived here by chance. The ship that landed on Earth was one that had originally been sent by you. You have a chance to return home once more, together with the catgirls you have become fond of... "This world has also become my home." A new catgirl has appeared. Do you love this catgirl? A new story begins when such a catgirl appears. This is a story of this catgirl, and her friends who she met by chance. It is a story that depicts how the catgirls and those who have become their friends live, the joys and problems they face, and how they find their way in a vast and wonderful world. "Blow your horns, and the world will notice!" For catgirl heroine Melius, her life begins when the cat

, Nigeria – Whenever engineers fix roads, they break more than roads: they accidentally unmask the impact of climate change in Nigeria and Africa. Residents of this coastal town were getting used to hearing how the old wooden bridge leading to their homes would be replaced with a new one in the next year. They were also told they would no longer experience the frequent floods that submerged their homes during the last rainy season. As the deadline came, the new bridge was brought down. So were the houses. A large pile of concrete stones would replace the old bridge, this time with a road to be built on top. The houses were the engineers' "mistake," locals told me. Each day, these men were hired by the government to build infrastructure, only to abandon their tasks, not to mention the houses they were hired to build, because they didn't read the fine print. Local officials told me water would never stop flowing down the same streams as before. Nigeria is a country of wealth and bad roads. In 2012, three out of five Nigerians lived on less than $1.25 a day. That year, daily transportation costs shot up; 45 percent of Nigeria's fuel imports went into maintaining asphalt roads — which only made conditions worse for the country's pedestrians. Last year, Nigeria was hit by torrents of rain during its rainy season, the result being that roads got sandier and water was deposited deep in the soil, causing deadly floods. But there's a new funding model in government. The government installed a new Ministry of Solid Waste, Water and Environment three years ago because citizens saw that infrastructure was the only common ground the government could grant itself. The new ministry recognized — for the first time — that if the old model of fund allocation was based on local planning, infrastructure fund allocation and follow-through could make a difference in the lives of Nigerians. Also, the ministry began to look at its consumption — its demand for fresh water at home, for example. Because the ministry's job was to serve Nigerians, it started to demand real data that would reflect the impact of its consumption. Last summer, the government called for bids — quick public talks — in villages across the country to ask for current data on how the climate was changing and determining which areas should receive government aid in fighting climate change. It invited both the ministry and environmental organizations to attend the talks. "
