Treatment of subfascial hematoma after amputation of lower extremity. Amputation of the lower limb remains a formidable challenge in the management of traumatic injuries and, with the ever increasing number of patients suffering with diabetes, elderly patients, and patients with multiple injuries. As modern medicine becomes more precise, current management of traumatic amputation has often included early revascularization and obliteration of dead space before definitive reconstruction. The use of fasciotomy has been avoided in favor of early amputation of the affected extremity due to the risk of contamination and the potential for the development of pseudoaneurysms. Our case, involving an elderly patient with an extensive traumatic injury to the distal lower extremity, illustrates the use of limited fasciotomy for the treatment of both infectious and noninfectious associated subcutaneous fascial hematomas, which were in turn responsible for extensive interstitial and subfascial edema, localized pseudofascial incarceration, and associated acute compartment syndrome. Evidence for intraspecific variation in mating type frequency in the alga Botryodiplomyces squarrosa. Although mating type frequencies are usually considered to be a true reflection of the heritable and stable composition of a given population, there is little direct support for this assumption. Here we describe an unusual phenomenon in Botryodiplomyces squarrosa. Small subpopulations of this alga were isolated from a sand flat contaminated with hydrocarbon oil. The sporophyte populations recovered from these areas were genetically homogeneous but contained variation in

Next time you find yourself in a conversation where someone is attacking a politician, ask yourself: Do they really care? Really? Most likely the answer is no — these people are most certainly full of malice and spite. But the question they really want you to ask is this: “Do they really care?” Why is that? The reason why so many people don’t care about politics is simply this: No one cares about politics. Well, everyone cares — it’s the #1 cause of human suffering on the planet. But for most people, it’s just a void. A way of arguing with your neighbor or watching a reality TV show or playing video games. It’s just a distraction from their lives. I knew this when I was starting out in the business — working in public relations, not actually doing any PR. I’d go to these meetings and listen to all of the cynical people talking about how the system is broken and how everyone is selfish and stupid. Every single time, I would ask them: “Do you really care?” And they’d look at me, look around the table and then look back at me like I was a total loser for asking such a stupid question. “Who are you? I don’t know you! You don’t understand this stuff. You’re just some punk blogger who thinks he’s important.” And what’s the response to that? Do you really care? The majority of those people, especially in the political world, have never thought about the big issues, not to mention they can’t articulate the big issues. So they’re basing their arguments on lifestyle arguments. For example: my parent’s car is more eco-friendly than your parent’s car. My phone is faster than your phone. My wallet is more secure than your wallet. You’re evil because you use a different wallet than me

Atheist blogger Linda Sarsour was brutally beaten by a religious man in New York City, and her alleged attacker had the audacity to blame her for her own death. I'm very glad to see racism is still a trend in the God-loving world. Back in the day before we had scientifically accurate paleontology, the idea of mankind being created in God's image was fascinating to a very few people. It was a far-out idea that didn't take off until Darwin proposed evolution as a theory. To those religious believers, God must have been some sort of creator-god, molding the world in his image. Those of us who didn't believe in God didn't want to hear that story, and we're glad. It isn't a situation we want to return to today. Apparently, Sarsour was the target of a racist bigot who believed if she weren't a Muslim, she wouldn't be dead. A professor was murdered by the Taliban About an hour ago, a professor at University of University of Peshawar, was murdered by the Taliban. The professor was a well-known linguistics professor, and the Taliban took great joy in murdering him for no other reason than he was a non-believer. That makes him just like every other atheist. As I said yesterday, if you want to help children suffering in the hands of Taliban, don't help Muslim children, help everyone. And a scholar like the University of University of Peshawar professor is always worthy of support, not just those kids in Pakistani jail. A theist was murdered in their sleep A theist was murdered while they were asleep. On Tuesday night, a non-theist was murdered. Obviously, this person has committed a sinful act, and God is demanding justice. Not as much as the Taliban demands justice, but
