We are an indie team, and are currently developing the game. Although we are developing the game in English, it will be released in other languages as well. We plan to release the game on mobile and on consoles, and we also aim to develop the game on a platform with the feel of a console game, with intuitive and easy controls. A portable computing system, such as a laptop computer, lacks the necessary connectors to connect to an external data source, such as a keyboard or desktop computer, thereby preventing the portable computing system from accessing data that it is capable of accessing via an external data source. In contrast, a desktop computer provides the necessary input/output (I/O) connectors for interacting with peripheral components, such as a keyboard and display. It's very simple! Q: Rails character issue when value is read from database I have a small Ruby on Rails app that models characters in a fantasy roleplaying game. In the system, I have a field where users can enter their attributes. The field gets created as a text field in the database, and when the user enters their stats they are stored as a varchar column in the table. The issue I'm having is if the user enters a string like "str" for strength, instead of reading it as "strength" (as I'd expect), it is reading it as "str", so the stats for strength become "str2". How can I get it so that strings that are entered are stored correctly in the database? A: When you want to do that in database you need to use some type conversion in database. Try to add a migration like this in a database:

class AddStrenghtColumn 255 end end // // IQScrollViewController.m // Created by IqDe on 15/6/3. // Copyright (c) 2015 IqDe. All rights reserved. // #import "IQScrollViewController.h" @interface IQScrollViewController () @property (weak, nonatomic) IBOutlet UIScrollView *scrollView; @end @implementation IQScrollViewController - (void)viewDidLoad { [super viewDidLoad]; [self.view addSubview:self.scrollView]; } #pragma mark - UIScrollViewDelegate - (UIViewController *)viewControllerForScrollView
