It seems to be a tradition these days to release new versions of Mac OS X as the release date nears, and things typically calm down when the update is released. We're no stranger to this strange annual update patch issue at MacLife, but this past week was slightly different than expected, as it introduced Mac OS X 10.8.1, which not only includes the tweaks that many of you were expecting, but also introduces

Is it a question to which the answer can be found in the original gangsters of propaganda? The Soviet media during Joseph Stalin's early years and the Chinese Communist party throughout Mao Zedong's rule and beyond are clear examples of the only two countries ruled by political parties and regimes which have employed media propaganda as the single most effective tool to achieve their authoritarian goals. The primordial reasons for this propaganda are simple and, especially for Stalin, not entirely justified in terms of a strategic defensive—but he liked to tell people that the Soviet public believed that the country's armed forces were invincible and capable of surviving without the support of the media. The last 20 years in China, or the last 17 in Russia, have been periods of media saturation, far outstripping those of the past. The difference is that the present total media saturation is not on the part of a single political party or a single personality, such as Stalin or Mao, but across the whole spectrum of the Chinese and Russian publics. The Soviet people did indeed believe this, however, and also that the Soviet media were the most respectable of the media in the world. The Chinese public is still not entirely aware of the reality that, just a few months after the Communist
