What's new:

This page is about the occult and secret trials of Argos in antiquity. For the cult, see Argus. For the Emporia itself, see Argus (Imperial era). For the days of the month, see the list below. Cronology The earliest attested account of a trial of Argive colonists dates to 738 BC, when Argos was one of the 12 towns sending colonists to conquer the island of Thasos (a Mytilenean region on the northern tip of Anatolia, settled by the Mytileneans in 770). Aelian offers several variations of these phenomena of late migrations. In the sixth century, Pausanias (Description of Greece: chapter 3) records that there were colonies of Argive women living on Imbros, in Lesbos, in the old Italic colony at Messene and at Byblos and in Cyprus. The earliest attested account of the Argive Mysteries of Argus dates to circa 725 BC, when "a ship of Argos" landed in Corinth and handed Demosthenes a silver crown. These proceedings, according to Pausanias, were in fact commemorated yearly at the Argive Mysteries of Argos. This account is found also in inscription 2325 created from a decree dated to the twelfth year of the siege of Acrocorinth in 424 BC. In 424 BC, Pericles forced the people of Mytilene into the city of Argos, and considering Mytilene's action a threat Pericles reinforced the fortifications of the city. In 433 BC, with increased efforts to slow Pericles' appearance at Athens, the Argives built a wall on the Paeonian Hills and also had the shield presented to the sanctuary of Hera in Argos inscribed with Daphnila's name. In 431 BC, the Argives sailed to Eretria, of which the people are now said to commemorate annual feasts at the count of Argus. The range of battlements following the strategy to change their location implied the increasing dependence of Argos on Syracuse. In 427 BC, in a second initiative to increase their independence from Syracuse, the Argives had Demosthenes establish a fort at Diconea. In 413 BC, they further pursued independence by taking the fortress of Sicyon from Syracuse. They also took the Oracle at Delphi in 393-392 BC. All of the Argives revol
