Informatica Optimizer for DevExpress is the easiest way to optimize your databases. It helps you eliminate schema redundancies, duplicate data, and data types that you can safely ignore and it gives you a faster and easier way to configure, maintain and monitor any database. Besides that, it automates common business processes, such as data cleansing, data conversion, data loading, data duplication and e-mail sending. Seven Components Configuring the Source System For direct access to database, there are two choices - Programmatic connection with the database, and JDBC connection. For Java connection, a JDBC driver is needed to connect to the database. For XML and ODBC connection, the corresponding connector drivers are included in the distribution package. Selecting a Repository The Configurator picks one or more repositories from either the instance or the global Repository list. A repository is a predefined set of fields in the database that defines the mapping between the entities in the source and the dynamic structure of the destination. In most cases, the corresponding destination structure is defined automatically when the mapping is created. For example, if the entity named "Customer" is mapped to the destination named "Country", the Configurator can automatically generate the structure "Country". Repositories are usually grouped into Data Transfer Objects (DTOs), which define how a set of entities is mapped to an abstract object structure. Selecting a Destination The Configurator only offers the default destination structure. You can use the Destination Configurator in order to create more complex structure for a destination. In most cases, when performing a data mapping you don't have to do anything else apart from mapping the source to the destination and selecting the destination structure (for example: FlatFileDestination). Mapping Source Data to Destinations When the source database and the destination database match, the data is automatically mapped. You can also map a single source entity to multiple destinations (for aa67ecbc25

Searching for documents has never been so easy! Find Desktop allows you to create a "virtual" application folder for your desktop folders. This application folder acts as the starting point for your desktop searches. From there, you can easily "navigate" in your Desktop folder structure to obtain whatever file you need! This is not just the standard search through all your documents. Your folders also have contents. It is possible to find and to preview the documents directly within these folders! To make sure that this directory is really your application folder, you can "protect" it with a password. In fact, your are automatically asked to set a password before any search. This password is absolutely necessary to have Find Desktop work properly. For example, you can have the following folder structure on your computer: C:\Documents and settings\user\Desktop\test\ext C:\Documents and settings\user\Desktop\test\zip You can start the standard desktop search and all your results will be linked to the "ext" folder. You can open this folder in order to check if the documents are really the ones you are looking for. If all documents are there, you can then select the documents and they will be opened. On the other hand, if you are looking for zip file, you will be shown one document for each ZIP file instead of the "ext" folder. The same principle can be applied to any kind of folder, such as: bin, com, inc, lib, share, etc... This software is compatible with Windows, Linux, Mac and with any other OS! New!
