Zinc oxide nanoparticles reduce pathogen proliferation and biofilm formation in Galleria mellonella. Bacteria live in communities and employ mutualistic and parasitic relationships with other organisms. Wound infections can result from a combination of bacteria in the wound and non-pathogenic organisms such as fungi and yeast. We present evidence that the use of nanotechnology and nanoparticles has resulted in the production of less hazardous products, which have enhanced properties such as antimicrobial activity and reduced toxicity. In this work, we investigated the potential of zinc oxide (ZnO) nanoparticles to reduce the growth of bacterial pathogens and biofilm formation. Three gram-negative pathogens were employed; Escherichia coli, Pseudomonas aeruginosa and Serratia marcescens, and one gram-positive, Staphylococcus aureus. The ability of nanoparticles to affect bacterial growth was assessed using growth curves, turbidimetry, scanning electron microscopy and dynamic light scattering. ZnO nanoparticles had a direct effect on bacterial growth and biofilm formation in all three organisms. Treatment of the biofilm cells with nanoparticles resulted in detachment of the biofilm layer. A limited number of gram-positive bacteria produced biofilms; it was more likely that these biofilms were formed from pre-existing bacterial populations rather than from planktonic bacteria. ZnO nanoparticles are effective in reducing the growth of gram-negative and gram-positive bacteria. These nanoparticles also have the ability to disrupt and remove established biofilms, which will likely lead to more effective control of disease in the environment. Inhibition of platelet aggregation in normal subjects by low molecular weight heparins. The effect of low molecular weight heparins (LMWH) on platelet aggregation was studied in eight healthy volunteers. All subjects received a single intravenous injection of two different LMWH, dalteparin 5000 IU or tinzaparin 1750 IU, and one antithrombin III (AT III) concentrate, AT III concentrates 50-100 IU/ml. Both drugs significantly decreased platelet aggregation induced by collagen, ADP and arachidonic acid, while ristocetin aggregation was unaffected. The inhibitory effect of both LMWH and AT III was dose
