The livery driver is a critical link in the marketing chain for car-related services. A number of studies have reported on the experiences of livery drivers. In addition, surveys and interviews with livery drivers are regularly undertaken. Some of the issues that affect the way in which livery drivers are marketed are discussed in this article. Among these issues are the following: the image of the livery driver, perceptions of service quality, service costs, and negative perceptions of the livery business. Livery services are integral to the car industry's marketing plans and, as such, play a significant role in creating public perceptions of the industry. Livery services also have a substantial effect on car owners' attitudes toward car ownership. It is important that livery drivers can understand the advertising and marketing programs directed to them, their customers and the public. It is important that drivers are given their own distinctive livery to promote the image of livery services. Chemoenzymatic synthesis and bioactivity of fucose containing glycopolymers of sialyl Lewis X. In order to probe the conformational characteristics of the carbohydrate of the cancer-associated carbohydrate Lewis(x) (Le(x)), a series of glycopolymers containing the sialyl Lewis(x) (sLe(x))-type carbohydrate unit were synthesized using the Staudinger-phosphite method and Escherichia coli cells. The results demonstrate that the sLe(x)-type polymers synthesized in vivo possess better binding affinities for blood group P and Le(a)-Le(b) lectin than the corresponding polymer synthesized in vitro.
