Posterior muscle shortening after acute lung injury: an experimental study. The objective of this study was to investigate the association of acute lung injury with changes in respiratory and skeletal muscles and to determine whether acute lung injury reduces the power of the diaphragm in a canine model. Prospective experimental study. Research laboratory at a university medical center. Thirty-three young adult mixed-breed dogs. The right main bronchus was intubated. Two dogs did not have anesthesia and were excluded from the study. All dogs were ventilated with a tidal volume of 10 mL/kg, a frequency of 15 breaths/min, a positive end-expiratory pressure of 5 cm H₂O, and a fraction of inspired oxygen of 0.21. The dogs were randomly assigned to a control group (n = 13) or an acute lung injury group (n = 10). The fraction of inspired oxygen was changed from 0.21 to 0.21.1 in the control group and to 0.21.1 in the acute lung injury group. The fraction of inspired oxygen in the study group was maintained at 0.21.1 for 3 hrs or until the acute lung injury group's PaO₂/FIO₂ ratio was less than 200. The fraction of inspired oxygen in the control group was also maintained at 0.21.1. The left hemidiaphragm was stimulated by phrenic nerve stimulation. We used a strain-gauge force transducer to measure peak force. The area of the diaphragm at the end of inspiration and the transdiaphragmatic pressure (P_{di}) were also measured. Acute lung injury was associated with a significant decrease in transdiaphragmatic pressure (P <.01) and in the area of the diaphragm at the end of inspiration (P <.05). These changes were associated with a significant decrease in the peak force-to-area ratio of the di
