The invention relates to a contact clip for a contact strip. As a rule, contact strips of this kind contain at least one contact element, for example an electrical contact pin. The contact element is firmly anchored in a plastic or metal clip. It is fixed in the clip in order to have it lie in a planar manner against an object to be contacted, for example a printed circuit board or the like. From German Patent Specification DE 34 07 785, a contact clip is known in which the contact element is arranged in a receptacle which is open toward the top. A central base part is formed as the housing for this receptacle, the base part being molded onto one end face of the receptacle. The base part has a plug-in opening through which contact elements can be inserted into the receptacle. After such insertion, projections act on the base part from the inside to fix the contact element. The base part is stamped out of sheet metal. The base part acts as a housing for the clip and does not have a base on which a contact strip can be held. Furthermore, the base part is relatively expensive to make. From German Patent Specification DE 32 07 115, a contact strip is known in which the contact element is received in a strip-like receptacle and is fixed. The receptacle contains a sleeve-like holding piece which surrounds a cylindrically-shaped armature. In a contact strip of this kind, it is disadvantageous that the armature has only a small stability. The contact strip can easily be deformed. Furthermore, an electrical contact is not provided at the end face of the clip which is to be brought into contact with a printed circuit board.#!/usr/bin/ 79a2804d6b
