What sets this documentary apart from the many other films that explore the concept of beauty is its ability to bridge the gap between the popular and the academic, between the industry that creates the images and the people who want to be beautiful. Oscar Pistorius was a world-famous athlete and bad-boy, married to a model. He killed his girlfriend in the early hours of Valentine’s Day, 2013. The media sensationalized his story, fueled by the release of Rihanna’s book, a memoir that gave details of her relationship with Oscar and the court testimony of her family’s broken hearts. Her death sparked the debate on media obsession that leads us to glorifying the perfect image that then becomes a social construct for individuals to subscribe to. Everyone has ideas of what it takes to be beautiful. As a South African, we struggle to grasp the concept of beauty that seems synonymous with white people. We see it in the extreme when drugs and alcohol take over, when relationships are based on greed and power plays, and in the mind of a community that persecutes its own. The idea of beauty can be so diverse, we consider it an innate part of us. But who is our
