In some conventional approaches, to extract spectral color information related to a particular class of video content, such as a particular object in a video scene, color information may be extracted in the chrominance channel of the video. This chrominance information may then be binned into a histogram based on the particular class of video content. This distribution may then be clustered into "superpixel" regions, where each superpixel region corresponds to a particular class of content. Typically, such a histogram may be represented as a rectangular matrix where the height of the matrix indicates the frequency of the color components in the chrominance channel. This histogram may be the result of segmenting or analyzing the video content into regions or superpixels that represent particular classes of video content, such as objects in a video scene. If it is desired to extract additional information or knowledge about the particular classes of video content represented by the superpixels, a number of conventional approaches may be employed. In some approaches, for example, a superpixel may be characterized by its color information in the chrominance channel of the video content, where that information represents the class of the video content represented by the superpixel. Commenting On: Conference realignment in college football will no longer lead to selection committee dissension
Conference realignment in college football will no longer lead to selection committee dissension
By Ian Morrison and Tyler Emerick / MLB.com | NEW ORLEANS -- If you've ever wondered how the inaugural College Football Playoff selection committee was stacked, we have your answer. The committee's voting and tasking was a mystery for months until ESPN analyst and former SEC coach Dave O'Brien confirmed it in May. He said in his ESPN The Magazine interview with college football great Archie Manning that the Football Bowl Subdivision would have one vote, and the rest would be distributed among the Power 5 leagues: the Atlantic Coast Conference, Big 12 Conference, Big Ten Conference and the Southeastern Conference. "They get one vote, one vote, they get one vote," O'Brien explained in the magazine. "The other 11 votes go to the leagues." According to O'Brien's account in the interview
